In 2016, on 1 April, Victoria's ground-breaking Royal Commission into Family Violence handed down 227 recommendations, aimed at transforming responses to family violence and working towards eliminating gendered violence, particularly violence against women and children. One year later, this panel of Victorian and national experts examines the progress of government and community responses, the work still to be done and the challenges ahead. Significant progress and commitment are identified while challenges and concerns still exist about evidence, implementation, resources and gaps.
